

Casper Johnson studied archaeology and geology at the University of Bristol before going on to work for English Heritage, the Cotswold Archaeological Trust and Archaeology South-East (ASE - University College London's Field Archaeology Unit). During his time at ASE, Casper worked with David Martin on a number of archaeological projects in and around Winchelsea, including the recording of the town wall along Rookery Field for the National Trust. Casper joined Kent County Council's heritage team in 2002 before becoming County Archaeologist at East Sussex County Council in 2006.
