

Patrick Ottaway is currently an archaeological consultant working for commercial clients on archaeology and heritage matters in the planning process. In 2006, he left York Archaeological Trust, where he was Head of Fieldwork, having worked for the Trust for 25 years. Previously, he had been Assistant City Archaeologist for Winchester. Patrick has a D Phil from York University, awarded for a study of 9th – 11th century iron objects from York. He also has an MA in economic history from Leeds University, where he was a student of Professor Maurice Beresford. His dissertation was on the subject of 16th- 17th century village and town maps. His principal academic interests lie in the archaeology and economic history of Roman – medieval towns and in ironwork of the Anglo-Saxon and medieval periods. He is the author of numerous publications, including Archaeology in British Towns (1992), Roman York (2004), Artefacts and Society in Roman and Medieval Winchester: Small Finds from the Suburbs and Defences 1971-86 (with H. Rees et al., 2008) and Craft, Industry and Daily Life: Medieval Finds from York (with Nicola Rogers, Archaeology of York 17/15, 2002). He is also Hon. Editor of the Archaeological Journal, a Fellow of the Society of Antiquaries of London and a Member of the Institute for Archaeologists.
